Trait descriptions

Factor I

Factor II

Factor III

Factor IV

Factor V

Factor I was labelled as Extroversion by the developers of the IPIP-BFFM. Factor I is sometimes given other names, such as Surgency or Positive Emotionality.

Individuals who score high on Factor I one are outgoing and social. Individuals who score low tend to be shut ins.

I think there is something to be said for people who are not overtly social. I will meet up with my buds a few times a month and a couple of us are near by each thers and we can be indoors talking from 6pm at night till 6am are one of the local coffee joints. I think we often overvalue the need to be social and under value those who enjoy both solitude and being social.

Rather negative if you not high in your test... Isn't OK to be non-structural, as an example /don't get me started on the others). I think MBTI / JTI is more positive

Like · Reply · 5 · 3y

Positive and negative are irrelevant, the big five is more accurate while MBTI has been derided as worthless by psychologists for decades.

INTJ as my MBTI, INTp ILI-2Ni as my Socionics, and I got this. Extroversion 16 (who get it high is outgoing/energetic and denotes energy, positive emotions, assertiveness, sociability, and the tendency to seek stimulation in the company of others), Neuroticism 30 (people who get it high will associated with mental illnesses, depression, phobias, and emotional imbalances), Agreeableness 7 (people who get low is associated with psychopathic traits and proved all psychopaths scored very low in this - it is not good in my case), Conscientiousness 93 (who get it high is dependable, dilligent, prepa... [illegible]

The conscientiousness is way too low; I get my work done on time and well. I just don't put my things away! I'm in a PhD program, and have to prioritize my time, mental effort. and physical energy. Also, I've recently had three deaths in the family (both parents and my Godfather), which have affected my mood. Your questionnaire does not consider life contingencies. Perhaps your N will be large enough to balance them out, but as an individual gauge, this is inaccurate.

Nobody cares

My wife is about 100 conscientiousness, and if WWII breaks out, the house will remain immaculate. You said it yourself. You prioritize order below some other things. It's not a judgment.

I do.

Another comment: The label of "Intellect/Imagination" applied to "Openness to Experience" is inaccurate. I know several people who have what would be classified as intellectual disabilities (such as Down Syndrome) who are very much open to new experiences. I know any number of people who are conservative and traditional who are also highly intelligent AND open to new experiences, and people who are neither conservative nor traditional, but are incredibly close-minded (anyone who doesn't see things their way/go along with their ideas is not worth their time), or have intellectual challenges.

<https://openpsychometrics.org/tests/IPIP-BFFM/results.php?r=2.4,3.5,3.4,4.2,3#> V to me, these examples indicate that intellect/imagination is not the same construct as Openness to Experience: one is about mental capability; the other is about a sense of curiosity and/or adventure.

Like · Reply · 18 · 3y

Lacey J Thiessen

you seem to be taking a very individual, anecdotal approach to this. That's not the purpose of this test. Openness and Intelligence are the two most highly correlated personality traits. I don't what that say about your personal experiences, but these tests are very broad. Large sample sizes. Your experiences are a drop in the bucket.

I think the big five correlate somewhat to the MBTI tests (Factor 1 - Introversion/Extroversion, Factor 2 - Assertive/Turbulent, Factor 3 - Feeling/Thinking, Factor 4 - Judging/Perceiving, Factor 5 - Sensing/Intuitive). MBTI data does show that the personality types with the highest MBTI score did tend to be iNtuitive types (or in this case very open to experience, higher 5 factor score), especially introverted intuitives.

Conservative/traditional people that are open to new experiences, and non-conservative closed minded people are both likely smack down in the middle of the Sensing/iNtuitive, or in this case, Factor 5 ,and likely do not lean one of the other way significantly. They likely balance their more tangible experiences and large pools of over-arching data/possibilities equally, or prefer to base their decisions and thoughts on one over the other depending on the subject.

Discuss the following:

Do you agree or disagree with the results?

Yes.

What was the result that most surprised you?

None were surprising.

If there is a trait you disagree with, discuss why.

The test is very close to describing me. I think I am very imaginative.

How might these results be useful to you in your interactions with others?

I see ways that I can improve myself. I need to listen more and be more attentive to my surroundings. None of my scores show a real bad weakness. I just need to be more aware of myself.

Hmmm, you're right. It made you made think for a moment. Maybe looking at what other people do and rating their behavior from one's own perception may actually be more telling about how you think and are in your own behavior. Basically looking at others to see how we relate or do not relate in comparison which in turn can help give a general definition of ourselves. I feel personally I never like being labelled or placed in a categories that still seem to vague. More highly scenario based questions are in order perhaps.

importance or context is ignored. In what situations is my emotional stability more labile? About what am I conscientious, what careless? The discussion missing is the hierarchy of these characteristics and the level to which they are generally applicable to me in every day life.

Your personality is the type of traits that are CONSTANT across different situations and times, which means, for example, if someone was emotionally instable they will tend to be instable across different situations. Therefore, the context is irrelevant to personality measures because they measure CONSTANT traits.

Michael Tolhurst I think you make some very excellent points, and I happen to completely agree with you.

Side note on a related but separate concept from those you mention: I think it is a mistake for psychologists to take a 'binary' approach to these assessments, where outside factors, contexts and explanations are excluded. I suggest, in psychological assessment tools, as in other areas of psychology, that psychologists take an algorithmic approach, where contexts are taken under consideration and calculated into the score.

Of course, it holds that a large majority of test results will b... See More

Just skimming the surface, it seems to me that "this is a great test" is the response of those who agree with the "findings," while "this needs work" comments are from those who feel that, in some way, they scored "low" in an area they think they are "stronger" in. If I understand this "test," we are not looking for an objective measure of how "good" a person is (or is not), but a general guide to the likelihood that certain traits, or outcomes, or behaviors, will manifest themselves in someone's life. I scored low on trait IV, and I know this is an area where I need improvement. Not procrastinating, keeping my work and home environment neat, and following a job all the way through to the end are constant struggles for me. They may be "character flaws," but I don't see that they make me a bad person. But seeing a graphic assessment of the relative strength of this trait is helpful.

I am a hermit but I scored high on factor one. So I can't really agree with this test. I am not that I am a normal person, I agree that I am not very outgoing unless put into the situation and for me to feel comfortable I have to become openly normal in those situations. I am down the middle or off to the left a bit with groups or social events. Anxiety and bad health have played their roll.
